The New York Times recently published an article saying that nearly one in five teens drink alcohol, use drugs and smoke during the school day. And more than one third said it's fairly easy to do so without getting caught.

According to the 17th Annual Back-to-School Survey conducted by the National Center on Addiction, reported that more than ever before middle and high school students know how to buy alcohol, marijuana, or find prescription drugs within a day.

For the sixth consecutive year, 60 percent or more of the teens who took part in the survey stated that drugs are used, kept, or sold at schools and 52 percent said there's a place on or near school grounds where students go during the day to use drugs, drink or smoke.

Elizabeth Jorgensen, psychotherapist who has a private practice and treats teens with drug addictions, said in a recently published article; "Kids are feeling much more emboldened to use at school." She added, "There is not the stigma among teenagers not to use drugs, even for high-achieving students. It used to be that kids understood that doing drugs would jeopardize their future, but that's no longer the case."
